OIL PALM PLANTATION WORKS

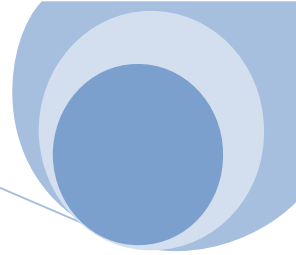

Cultivating oil palm not only requires the right climate and soil. Obtaining maximum yields at each production stage also depends on the quality of seeds used, a rigorous selection process of seedlings in the nursery, good soil preparation before seeds are planted, the setting up of plantations correctly and the right use of fertilizers.

Oil palm plantations require intensive labor and much care. Palm trees need to be protected and nurtured carefully so that they grow, develop and reach their maximum yields as quickly as possible. Good plantation management also involves protecting the oil palm throughout its life span and ensuring that other crops do not take away the water, light and soil nutrients it needs. The oil palm also needs to be protected against pests and diseases and requires the right amount of water and nutrients when necessary. Finally, it is important that leaves and bunches are cut carefully so as not to damage the plant.

A varied labor force with different levels of expertise and experience work on oil palm plantations is added to make sure all the process of producing good outcome of fruits. The way fruits are harvested, transported and processed all affect the quality of oil produced in the end. The design of a plantation, including the lay out of its lots, paths and canals and the site of a palm oil mill, all play an important role in oil palm cultivation, including how fruits are harvested and transported to the mill.

DEVA PLANTATION is specialized in this entire process of works and maintains its quality of works to produce a good fruit. With Mr.Deva's 40 years of experience in plantations, he has the ability to manage all the process of managing and harvesting at the oil palm field.
